Long term survival after lung resection for neoplastic disease. Seventy-seven patients underwent lung resection for neoplastic disease. Two forms of anaesthesia were used. The patients in the routine anaesthesia group had no pretreatment with intravenous sedation and were given a general anaesthetic during lung resection. The patients in the general anaesthesia group had intravenous sedation with midazolam and/or diazepam and were given a general anaesthetic during the resection procedure. An inhaled anaesthetic was used for lung resection in all cases in the latter group. Following lung resection, the median survival in the routine anaesthesia group was 7 months (range 0-142 months) and it was 10 months (range 0-159 months) in the general anaesthesia group. Twenty-seven patients in the latter group were alive at a median follow up of 8 months (range 0-143 months). These figures have remained the same with the passage of time. The median survival of patients with small cell cancer in the same group was 3 months (range 0-50 months) and 12 months in the non-small cell group (range 0-145 months). The results do not support the routine use of a general anaesthetic during lung resection for neoplastic disease in patients undergoing lung resection for small cell cancer or who are without metastasis and can be managed conservatively.
